An Incident.

dreds came to look at her face, but she re mained unidentified. Potter's Field was her destination. Without home or family or money, a pauper's grave awaited her. Whether her name was Mrs. Browne or not is no matter. "Mrs. Browne died of rat poison," was the only comment offered as her body was placed in the Margne for identification. In life she was a handsome woher betokened culture and refinement. She must have known what disposition would be made of her body, and evidently expect ed no more or less than an interment at Pot ter's Field. Upon her person was found a small sum of money as if meant to expedite this purpose.

Day after day, for nearly two weeks, her body lay exposed to the gaze of the hun dreds of curious, idle or interested persons who called to see it. That she was a young and beautiful woman was enough, at least to enlist the idle curiosity of many who cared not what might become of the body.

er, and yet no mother, surrounded with all the joys of love and family, came forward to offer a decent burish for this unhappy woman. No wife or daughter in Christian charity would save her from a pauper's grave, nor in all this great city apparently did there exist for this one victim of despair and sorrow a single soul whose sympathy for this unfortunate woman would have saved her there came there a young man who claimed to identify "Mrs. Browne" as a Mrs. Ada Browne, of Philadelphia. According to his etory Mrs. Browne had left her husband some few years since on account of the ex-treme cruelty her husband inflicted upon her. Two children were also left behind. Whether this be so or not, the woman this young man thus sought to identify, left her home, husband and family, in company with himself, and as man and wife the Mrs. Browne of the Comptom House, or some other Mrs. Browne, lived with this young

He did not dare to, nor did he give any tangible evidence in support of his testimony. If he had lived with her he did not offer to defray the expenses of a decent burial, but merely hinted at some "rich man" who had sent him to the Morgue, and then he vanished. He looked well able to meet these expenses had he so desired.

that were uttered in behalf of the myste fate to befall us, who would give us any sympathy? Whoever this woman is, we are sisters in sorrow, and one good action happy person, who but for the charity of strangers would now lie buried at Pot-ter's Field. Here the Actor's Fund have a plot, also the Order of Eiks and the Seaman's Association, which gives sailors of whatever nationality a decent and Christian burial.

To this cemetery on Thursday afternoon went a hearse, followed by a single carriage The hearse contained the body of "Mrs. Browne," the carriage the two erring but until the spot selected for the grave was reached. There the occupants alighted and silently watched until the coffin was finally lowered into the grave. One of the women threw a flower—a rose—into the grave with the last shovelful of earth,

No headstone marks the place, but a rose bush may blossom there in the spring, a token of love and of the compassion of a repentant woman .- N. Y. Herald.
